I mean, of course, upon the view taken in this essay of man's tripartite nature. The principles here stated would lead me to conclude in the negative--it is not possible. Without Psyche I could not conceive of moral fall or moral elevation in man. Angels no doubt have fallen, but man's nature, if threefold, cannot rise or fall in a state of disintegration. The spirit may exist, but man cannot improve. He may be pardoned: this is another and a different question, and in no sense dependent upon the view here taken of his threefold nature. What I wish to notice is, that probation is impossible in the spiritual world, because man's ethical and religious nature is, in the view here taken, as it were in abeyance. If I had to accept the doctrine of moral probation after death, I...
